Islam

A religious issue which Ibn Sina (Avicenna) examined philosophically was the fate of the individual self. The Qur'an speaks of reward and punishment in the hereafter. This implies a re-creation (or continuation) of individual identity after death. (Whether it is re-created at the moment of judgement, or sustained after the individual's death, and if so, in what form and what states, is a question which was endlessly debated by theologians, and not surprisingly, without agreement.) Ibn Sina took a major step away from Hellenistic thought by arguing for individual immortality. In the process, he proposed what he thought was a proof for the existence of the soul. If a person were to imagine himself as 'suspended' in space, i.e. without dimensions, weight, and organs or limbs, he would still retain a sense of 'I'. This proved that there is an individual soul, and that it does not have to perish with the body.
