The new AS paper 2B, which covers the options of the German Reformation (2B.1) and the Dutch Revolt (2B.2) saw responses from across the ability range.

In general, candidates found Section A, the compulsory two-part source question, more challenging. Some were not clear on what was meant by ‘value’ and ‘weight’ which hindered their ability to analyse and evaluate the sources (AO2). In addition, the detailed knowledge that was required to add contextual material to support and/or challenge points derived from the sources was sometimes absent. Some candidates therefore, spent considerable time adding knowledge to their answer that was only peripheral to the enquiry and did not help them with the task in hand. There were also a number of rather generic comments on the nature, origin or purpose of the sources which did not enhance candidates’ answers.

Section B, the section in which candidates were given a choice of three essays in order to assess understanding of the period in depth (AO1), tended to be done better. Few produced wholly descriptive answers and most attempted to engage analytically with the demands of the questions. The majority of answers were soundly structured and clearly expressed. They also made some effort to come to a judgement. The most common weakness in this section was a lack of detailed knowledge of the material. Perhaps as a consequence, there was also a tendency among some not to engage fully enough with the specific focus of the question. Some students glossed over, or in some cases ignored, this which seriously impacted on their ability to attain higher marks however strong the remainder of their answer.
Question 1 (a)
Most candidates were able to identify the source as an example of the angry radicalism unleashed in the early 1520s and many used their own knowledge to link this to Luther’s challenge to clerical authority in the preceding period. There were some very good responses which were able to point out how many of the criticisms made by Storch may have drawn inspiration from Luther’s pamphlets of 1520 or his defiance at Worms even though he never intended his ideas to be taken so far. Weaker candidates tended to paraphrase the source and/or be drawn into assessing why the source was not valuable to the enquiry. It was clear also that knowledge of the Zwickau Prophets and the Peasants’ War was lacking for some.

Question 1 (a)

This L2 answer demonstrates some understanding of the source material and adds some contextual knowledge in support of the inferences it draws but would benefit from closer attention to the information in the source and more detailed development of the points it makes.
Indicate which question you are answering by marking a cross in the box ☒. If you change your mind, put a line through the box ☒ and then indicate your new question with a cross ☒.

(This is for part (a))

Source 1 shows that it was written before in the same year as the diet of nuns took place between the Catholic Church and Hus. Source 1 is very valuable to anyone investigating the radicalisation encouraged by Hus. The Catholic Church as it shows their views towards the priests were changing and more people were coming to realise how corrupt the Church was and by Hus and Nailing the 95 theses to St Peterburg did not help the Church to make their cases. The Source also shows how priests as well as the Church were exploiting peasants which alarmed them to become riches and the poor, even worse off. “If he does not hand them their price, heaven is closed” this from Nicholas Kaufmann could also be suggesting about the indulgences which Pope Leo X used in order to rebuild St Peter's Church, were being used in order for priests and preachers of the Catholic Church more money.

Source 1 also talks about suggest that this was part of the reason for the peasants revolt in 1525. Peasants were annoyed with the difference between the rich and the poor was forever getting wider and that the more from Luther was a sign sent by God to stand up to what they believed in. However, when the revolt broke out Luther was accused by the Church of being an heretic and his work had been interpreted which resulted in losing a lot of valuable support.
Overall, the source is very reliable in order to investigate the radicalism encouraged by Luther towards the Catholic Church as it highlights one of the biggest reasons for why so many Catholics turned to Lutheranism which was that the Church was not helping people but in fact exploiting them making it harder for illiterate people to get by during the 16th Century.
Question 1 (b)

There were some very good responses to this question which convincingly challenged Erasmus’ criticisms of Luther’s conduct of the Reformation in the early 1520s and so were able to come to a valid judgement about the weight of the source to the enquiry. So, for example, many pointed out that indeed Luther had sought the support of the authorities for his ideas but had been met with hostility and/or that Erasmus was blaming Luther for the social and political radicalism of the period which he famously condemned. More still pointed out that Erasmus was a moderate critic and that there many more hostile to Luther, from both sides of the argument. Weaker answers struggled to comprehend that Erasmus was criticising Luther’s methods rather than his ideas and lacked sufficient knowledge of developments in the early 1520s. Also, there were a number of rather generalised comments on the nature of the source, a private letter, which on their own, did not help assess its weight.

Question 1 (b)

This answer shows some analysis by making valid inferences from the source material and supporting these with relevant and accurate knowledge. It attempts to weigh the evidence of the source by suggesting ways in which it may and may not be useful to the enquiry. It was given a top L3 mark.
(This is for part (b)) Source 2 has some weight in the critique of Lutheranism in the early 1520s because it was written by a critic, Erasmus, a Lutheran: Philip Melanchthon, explaining some of the faults of Luther. However, it remains vague and only provides the criticism of one reason, therefore cannot suffice for an enemy into Lutheranism catechism.

Erasmus was a humanist scholar whom Luther denied much of his ideas. For this reason, we can expect little criticism of what Luther is saying, but rather how it is said. The tone of this letter is polite, trying to encourage Melanchthon to either be more conservative or influence Luther to do so. From my knowledge of Melanchthon, I knew that his Augsburg Confession of 1530 was moderate and less radical than that of Luther. This might suggest the impact of the letter. The timing of the letter is 1524, which is early 1520s, so we cannot doubt its historical accuracy. At the time, the Reformation was occuring, led by Ulrich von Hutten, followed by the Reformation itself. His might serve as an explanation for Erasmus disapproving such radicalism evident at the time. In regards to reliability, I give heavy weight to Source 2.
(This is for part (b)) As for context, Sasse 2 lacks it. It states a "crisis" for Western teachings, but urges only "pumped without destroying authority" which tells us关于 evidence on what Erasmus' lectures. He does not "few lines of words" and "people are moved and images for don" as radical views of Lutherans referencing denied marriage and iconoclasm, but notes to note iconoclasm was constant idea and that Luther did not directly start the rebellions. Luther himself critiques the person's revolt as destroying authority, something Erasmus states Luther regarding "pumped without destroying authority". The main critique of Luther on enrolling historian could gather is that Luther is "violent" and "nobody listens". Luther expresses their faiths "rather than improving popes and princes". He failed to see "pope element was not opposed to reforming and could "meet him half-way". He expresses hindsight that the way Luther attacked "corruption" was wrong. Erasmus agrees "Christianism is corrupt" but systems Luther was not "improving" remedies and was causing more harm than heuces. "Throwing everything into confusion", this provides very little weight in enacting duties.

As a conclusion, I find that although Erasmus' letter (Score 2) provides a reliable and accurate source, the information is not adequate for enacting unto (This is for part (b)) The critics of Luther as Erasmus is the only critic mentioned and the only Bvere odd. Actually, when the readings were dealed marriage canonicism and the reformers were largely the fault of radicals like Calvist, Von Hellen and the Zwingel prophets, the main argument seems against Luther's methods which tells us little about only that it is wrong. Overall, source 2 is mildly weighted on enemy into Luther's critics only as it is a reliable and accurate historial source which provides some insight on criticisms against Luther.
Question 2 (a)

Most candidates were able to identify this pamphlet as strongly critical of Alva’s rule in the Netherlands and used their own knowledge to develop this with reference for example, to the Council of Troubles and the Tenth Penny. Stronger candidates tended to have more detailed understanding of the period and were able to place the source in the context of Orange’s renewed challenge in assessing its value. Others commented on the source’s imitation of the Lord’s Prayer and inferred the religious motivation of the author. Weaker answers tended to paraphrase the source without attempting to analyse its value or were drawn into discussions of why it was not valuable to the enquiry.

Question 2 (a)

This L3 answer starts well by drawing valid inferences from the source and supporting these with accurate and relevant contextual knowledge. It also makes an attempt to evaluate the use of the source to the enquiry but gets drawn also into the limitations of the source which is not required in Question (a).

Question 2 ✗

(This is for part (a))

Source 3 is valuable to the historian when studying the response of the people to Alva’s rule in the Netherlands. We can see from the way Alva is addressed that he is largely unpopular in the opening line “Hellish father”, comparing him to the devil. This was a huge insult to Alva in the 1500’s as religion was the most important thing. We can also see a reaction to the Ten Shilling Tax where it states “You take away our daily bread”. The Ten Penny Tax was a permanent tax that Alva forcibly collected from all sales except land. This was in order to pay for his army as he had run out of money to pay them and Philip II was unable to send money as he was fighting a war with the Turkish people. The Ten Shilling Tax would have had a detrimental effect on the finances of the Dutch citizens, showing a possible link between the quote “You take away our daily bread” as they feel their money has been stolen. Source 3 also mentions
The Council of Troubles was implemented by the Pope in order to stop heresies. The quote states "his Council false and bloody." It is deemed as bloody because of the amount of people it once sentenced to execution, such as Count Hoorn and Egmont. Overall 1000 were executed. Source 3 describes the Council of Troubles as making "plunder and murder their daily study." This shows that the people of the Netherlands did not oppose the way people were murdered on account of being heretics as it went against the traditions of the Netherlands which was once a country of religious tolerance and free thinking.

The source is very one-sided making it a bad source for a historian to use because it only focuses on the unpopular actions Alva had done. It is quite biased in its attacking of Alva rather than including a more balanced view; however we do not know the writer as it was sent anonymously. It was a pamphlet piece that was widely distributed in secret. It is written in imitation of a...
Christian Prayer, perhaps targeting those with religious views. It dates to March 1572. The purpose of this pamphlet was to influence the views of the people on Alva, and to make them join the rebels in fighting his rule. Overall, Source A is useful to a historian if wanting a negative view of the people's reaction to Alva as it is very one-sided. For a balanced view, it...
Question 2 (b)

Good answers to this question clearly identified Orange’s mixed motives for returning to the Netherlands in assessing the weight of this source. Using his defensive language in combination with their knowledge of his previous conduct towards Spanish rule in the 1560s and/or his only recent religious conversion, they were able to discuss in some detail the doubts harboured about his intentions even among those close to him. Weaker candidates tended to take the source at face value and to assume, simply because he was writing privately to his brother, that he must be sincere. There was also some lack of detailed knowledge of the issues raised in the source with regard to Orange’s religious and political demands especially. Some candidates simply described the course of the Dutch revolt hitherto, without focusing on the specifics of the enquiry.

Question 2 (b)

This answer demonstrates some understanding of the source material and includes some sound contextual knowledge (though this is not always focused on the question). Its weakness is that it takes the source at face value and the comments made on utility are generic rather than about the specific purpose of the writer. It is an example of a borderline L2/L3 answer.
(This is for part (b)) Source 4 is a letter from William of Orange talking about the reasons for returning to the Netherlands in 1572 after being in exile in Germany. The source says “never and is not my intention to seek the slightest advantage for myself” and “I am not voluntarily pursuing some foolish notion.” This shows that William of Orange was not returning to the Netherlands for his own selfish gain, but he genuinely thought that the Netherlands were in trouble and needed to be rid of the Spanish Inquisition, who were ruling the country. Also, the source says “this whole country and state return to its ancient privileges and liberty.” This shows that William of Orange believes himself to be the only person willing to fully commit himself into challenging the role of Philip II and that he wants to restore what he calls “patriotism” and that has been taken away from the Netherlands, for example, the freedom of religion. The quote shows he is returning to the Netherlands to return the Netherlands back to the country it once was, in terms of religion and government.

The source is a letter written by William of Orange to his brother in 1573. This means the source is of a private nature as it was not published for propaganda or for the public’s viewing, but just a letter between family members. This could help to give some weight into the reason why William of Orange retired to the Netherlands, as generally, people feel more comfortable
(This is for part (b)) talking to family and there is no reason to lie about your intentions when there is only one person that will see it as your intentions. This means that Orange may have genuinely been warning the Netherlands to protect the country, rights, and privileges as what is said in the letter. However, the letter may not be given much weight as it does not really take into account the local beliefs at that time, and it may not be good to what Orange believed to be a problem but nobody else might. For example, in 1573 when the letter was written, many people were still Catholic and therefore supported the Spanish. Although it does not say so in the letter, there may have been other reasons as to why William of Orange returned back to the Netherlands. For example, if he was just retired after the Council of Troubles had kept him for treason and took away his land. This could be an important part for why he returned as had he not returned, he may have lost his standing as a powerful and rich gentleman and he may be being continually tried for treason and treason, in which he would have no way to defend himself if he was still in Germany. Also, after the execution of Count Horn and Count Egmont in 1568, Orange naturally became the leader of the rebels and the main
(This is for part (b)) nemesis of the Duke of Alva. This meant that he lead the rebellion and win the Dutch revolt, he would have to return. As well as this, as he had converted to a Lutheran (a German Protestant), it meant he had support from the German and the Dutch as well as the French after supporting the Huguenots. This meant William of Orange was in a much more stronger and peaceful position to challenge Alva and Philip II in general, which meant that 1572 was the perfect time to return to the Netherlands. Overall, I give this source a lot of weight as to why William of Orange returned to the Netherlands as it is primary and was not used for propaganda and there are many facts that support this, such as the fact that he continued to fight the Dutch revolt and be the leader of the rebels until his execution. However, there may be other reasons as to why he returned, which he denied in the letter, such as his own personal gains from returning at that time.)
Question 3

This was a popular question and most candidates framed an analytical response related to the success of Luther’s challenge in the year 1517-21. The better candidates focused at some length on the mistakes of Luther’s opponents and there were many detailed analyses of the failures of both the religious and political authorities to deal effectively with the growing severity and popularity of his challenge before considering a range of alternative factors. Such answers were also able to make links between these factors in coming to a judgement on the reason for Luther’s success, how for example, Leo X’s seeming complacency may be indicative of the reasons for the widespread anticlericalism in Germany which fed Luther’s success. Weaker answers however, touched lightly on the mistakes of Luther’s opponents before embarking on what often seemed like a rehearsed set of potential alternatives, often relating to the printing press. There was often little attempt to link these together and conclusions sometimes bore scant regard for the material previously produced.

Question 3

This essay focuses clearly on the reasons for Luther’s successful challenge to the Church in the years 1517-21 and covers a range of potential factors in some depth. It is well organised and attempts throughout to evaluate the importance of the material introduced before coming to a judgement. However, it is less convincing in addressing the stated factor in the question, “the mistakes of Luther’s opponents”, and received a high L3 rather than a L4 mark.

In the years 1517-21, humanism grew and flourished as it came into its element on form of religion. From the moment humanism officially put its 95 Theses on the Castle Church, on 31st October 1517, humanism became a national movement. However, it is equally as to what the success of humanism challenge was down to. There are many factors that contributed to success of humanism challenge included printing press, sermons, human himself etc and one may argue one is of or to a greater extent more important.

One may argue that to a great extent the mistakes of those who opposed humanism led to the success of humanism because ultimately if they were able to suppress it, it may not have grown. One of the people who opposed humanism was Charles V and to a great extent he made a lot of mistakes when it comes to dealing with human. Time after time, Charles V was frequently absent from the empire due to his conquering priorities in other parts such as Spain, France and so he was at times not within the empire to sort out the issues. For example after the Diet of Worms in 1521 he had to quickly return as Spain were revolting and so he had to see the restoration of order as well as France were invading France.
Thus he did not focus on the Habsburg issue. Also he had made mistakes on the front that he frequently looked over. Manner in order to get what he wanted in the form of troops and money as did his grandfather Maximilian I who was Emperor before him.
For example Maximilian looked over Hungary when he was trying to secure votes for his grandson's election more so as a result of these mistakes. Manner was able to expand and grow in great terms as in some sense it had freedom in which as well related to the 1559 Capitulation
Charles had to sign before coming.
Therefore meaning in some sense he was restrained in his power and so contributed to the success because Hungary challenge grew

However, another may argue that the mistakes of those who opposed him was not as great that a great effort important in this greater extent was the printing press. Arguably, the printing press was two fold. Elizabeth Kirkland argued the press precipitated the Reformation. Undoubtedly, the success of humanist challenge due to a lot of the printing press because it allowed his ideas to be widely circulated and spread as well as translated into making his ideas open to everyone not just the educated elite. During these years, many of humanist worked were in print, making roughly 90% two go.
These went through three editions in 1517 and a further 13 later on. The printing press also catered for the fact that 95% by the population were illiterate and unable to read. They produced woodcuts of his ideas in which Robert Scoene argues of these important or that “They were like gin, cheap, crude and effective.” They also made use of the fact that it was a very visual period, people were use to seeing that faith in glass windows, images etc.

One may argue that to a greater extent me first factor in the printing press was more crucial to the success of hume's ideas because me allowed many people to see and read about hume's ideas as ultimately without the press me ideas would have stayed on the church walls and just become a local phenomenon. However, on the other hand, the press may not be a great extent important because many of me ideas but were anti-catholic potentials and not hume's works. Also 4,000 copies of a pamphlet sound impressive until you realise it's only 1 per 3,000 people in 'The Empire'.

Although the printing press was not as important it could be argued that Martin hume himself was to a greater extent more important as to the success of his challenge. hume himself was charismatic and persuasive on paper he wrote in a way that ordinary people would understand or at least understand ultimately a boring writer would not have attracted an audience and so it could be argued he himself helped in the success of his challenge. In addition, he had a receptive audience which would have massively helped as people were willing to listen to his ideas as they had grievances and so wanted change.

Therefore one may argue that the extent to which Hume must have contributed to the success was great because ultimately Hume must have had something special about him to make people listen to his ideas as many people before had raised grievances and were not listened to. Moreover on the other hand, Boward Stable argues that if Hume had died it would not have ended the Reformation as he argues that the Reformation would have been a success with or without Hume.

Moreover, one may state that sermons were a greater extent the most important factor in creating the success of Hume’s challenge to the Catholic Church as during these years, Hutter delivered many sermons in which transformed pegas new. During his lifetime, he delivered over 6,000 sermons, many of which he printed so that they could be delivered by humans or other scholars. Sermons were of great importance so much that many villages spent funds on hiring preachers in who would deliver a sermon from a solemn opening to a shattering climax. Many people would come from all around to watch these. Andrew Petree details a report states that “sermons were the key weapon in disseminating hutter idea.” This refers to the fact that 95% of the population were illiterate and so though sermons, they were able to understand and interpret Hutter’s idea. Thus, even contributing greatly to Hutter’s effort. The success of Hutter’s early challenge.

Therefore one may argue this factor was to a greater extent of importance than the others because it allowed many more people to hear and understand Hutter’s beliefs and so causing more people to support him, leading to his success. However, one may state that it was not the most important reason.
Overall, all of these factors contribute greatly to the success of Henry's challenge to the Catholic Church. And yet, however, one may argue other contribute to a greater extent. One may state that the mistakes of those who opposed him were to a greater extent more important in causing his success because ultimately if Maximilian and Charles hadn't made mistakes to begin with, and instead had just suppressed Lutheranism and condemned Luther from the start, it would not have been able to grow and develop into a widely supported religion.
Question 4

There were only a handful of responses to this question which was focused on the extent to which Lutheranism had established doctrinal and institutional separation from the Catholic Church by 1530. Most struggled to come to terms with these demands and tended to describe the course of Luther’s challenge during the 1520s. A very small number had knowledge of the development of the schism in the 1520s either with regard to the development of Lutheran beliefs or how far reformed congregations had spread across Germany by 1530.

By 1530 Luther had established a clear and significant Lutheran Church. As he had many supporters and made the German people aware of the clear corruption amongst the papacy in Rome.

In 1517, Lutheranism started when Luther released the 95 Theses. He pinned to the door of St. Peter's in Rome stating that there was an extreme need for reform in the Church by exposing the corruption going on in the Church. Priests were living lavish lifestyles by tricking innocent people into paying for time off purgatory with grievances, which clearly did nothing and the money was going into the priests back pockets. Priests also were not remaining celibate and were sleeping with prostitutes. Luther even said himself, every corner you turn, in Some there is a prostitute. Due to the printing press in Germany at this time, people all over were able to get a copy of the 95 theses opening their eyes to what was going on in Rome and what all the money they were spending was going to, gaining him many followers.

In 1518 Luther had his debate with Calvijn talking about what was allowed and what was not in Germany at this time. One year later in 1519, Charles V was elected Holy Roman Emperor. However, due to him being distracted by external threats, Luther was able to have more of influence over Germany without facing as much conflict.

In 1520 Luther wrote the three pamphlets. The first was in German written in August decrying the Christian nobility. The second was written in September in Latin calling the pope 'Antichrist' and Rome 'Babylon'. The third was written in November once Luther did not have such extreme views.
The three pamphlets gained Luther popularity amongst Germans as he was starting to be recognised by people and becoming a known figure throughout Germany.

In 1522, Luther wrote the New Testament.

In 1521, Luther was excommunicated and went into hiding in Wartburg Castle by Frederick the Wise, also the Elector of worms and the local comunes was also released, giving Lutherism more power. Luther really started to get a grasp on a church stable church in 1522, when he wrote the New Testament, giving people something to go on and read as scripture where it was interpreted properly without the corruption of the council.

In 1524-25, it was clear Luther and started to revolutionise people's thinking as there was a peasants' war, where the poor wanted justice for what had been happening in Luther could spread the word more especially in 1527, during the Sack of Rome when Charles' army invaded Rome, attacking women and children. Charles' attention was on their giving Luther full reign to keep protesting without being interrupted. Also in 1529, Charles' attention was diverted again to the siege of Vienna. When the Ottoman Turks invaded and were stopped at the gates of Vienna.

Overall, by 1530, Luther had a fully established church with a great following, he was given free reign also due to Charles V's (The Holy Roman) attention was diverted to external conflict. Therefore, Lutheranism was not contained leading to a full established separate Lutheran church.
Question 5

This was another very popular question and again, most candidates were able to frame an analytical response focusing on Charles V's failure to combat Lutheranism by 1555. There were many very good answers who were able to analyse in some depth the way in which Charles' problems outside Germany (in Spain or with the French and the Turks) directly impacted on his inability to muster sufficient strength to destroy Lutheranism at key points during his reign as Emperor. They were also able to make links between the various factors discussed and use these to come to a reasoned judgement, how far for example the extent not just of his inheritance but also his dynastic ambitions played a role in his failure, notably after the defeat of the Schmalkaldic League. Weaker answers touched lightly on Charles’ difficulties outside Germany or tended to lack chronological range on the matter, many not extending past Charles’ absence from Germany during the 1520s. There were also many candidates whose discussion of Charles’ failure lacked range and/or depth in their knowledge: they were able to identify potentially relevant factors, the role of some German princes for example, without building on them to construct a convincing response.

Question 5

This answer shows only limited analysis of the features relevant to the question and is clearly lacking in both range and depth of relevant knowledge. Its conclusion has only limited substantiation. It was given a L2 mark.
Charles V was the Holy Roman Emperor when Luther was preaching. Charles V was from the long line that is the Hapsburg family and he had extreme wealth, hence being elected. Charles V hated Luther and everything he was about, he saw Luther as a threat to him and as someone who could potentially bring him down and even the Holy Roman Empire too.

Due to Charles V being from the Hapsburg family he also had a lot of land outside Germany, because of this Charles V was often away abandoning his post as Holy Roman Emperor and not being able to keep an eye on Luther and what he was doing.

Due to Charles V being from the Hapsburg family he also had a lot of land outside Germany. Because of this Charles V was often away abandoning his post as Holy Roman Emperor and not being able to keep an eye on Luther and what he was doing.

Although Charles V was away from Germany a lot he also had little power as the Emperor. Although from outside the Holy Roman Empire it seemed like Charles had power he didn't. There was no imperial army for the most part other than one Maximilian had created and to do anything Charles had to use the princes - he relied on them heavily which the princes came to realize more and more.

I don't think that Charles V failed to suppress Luther was because of what he was dealing with outside Germany. I think that the reason Charles V couldn't suppress Luther was because one he had little power and two because Luther was hugely popular, he had a huge following and not just of peasants but of important people such as Frederick the Wise. Charles V also failed to get the princes to run against Luther and without their support there was little he could do. At this time also states in the Holy Roman Empire began converting to Lutheranism further solidifying Luther's place and power. The reason Charles V couldn't suppress Luther once was because what he was Teaching many people and peasants agreed with Comptin was a huge issue at the time and because it had built up for so long when Luther came along it all sort of imploded.

There was a small element of Charles V problems that he faced outside of Germany the reason he couldn't suppress Luther because a lot of the time he wasn't there to see first hand what was happening and I think he missed a few key opportunities to suppress Luther that he didn't fully take advantage of. One being the Peasants War in 1525 at this time Luther lost a lot of support and could have been suppressed then.

Finally I believe that Charles V's failure to suppress Lutheranism in the years 1521-1555 was not caused by the problems he faced outside of Germany although that was a minor issue I don't believe it affected and caused the failure to suppress Luther. I think it was a failure because Luther was popular and had a lot of support not just from peasants, but from nobles, princes, and most importantly, Frederick the Wise. Charles V had little patience and he couldn't get the princes on his side which was the ring on the rock to his Protestant failure to suppress Luther.
Question 6

This question had a range of responses. The better answers were able to discuss Philip II’s responsibility for the growing unrest in the Netherlands in some depth, detailing his seeming contempt for the traditions of government and his insistence on obedience especially with regard to religious matters. Some were also able to consider Philip’s responsibility for the decisions taken by Margaret of Parma and Granvelle as part of this analysis, before going on to look at alternatives, the responsibility of the Grandees or the growth and aggression of Calvinism in the period for example. Weaker answers lacked the knowledge to come to a convincing conclusion and there was some lack of precision with regard to the dates in the question, several answers referencing Alva or the Sea Beggars.

Question 6

This essay clearly attempts to analyse matters relevant to the question and includes mostly accurate and relevant knowledge. It is also well organised. However, it lacks depth generally, especially with regard to Philip II’s actions, and its judgement is brief and lacking in conviction. It was given a low-mid L3 mark.

Unrest in the Netherlands from the years 1562-67 was minimal compared to later, but new existed to some extent. In this essay, I will argue that factors other than Philip played a pivotal role in causing unrest.

Philip II's actions could cause large amounts of unrest in regards to his stance against the privileges in particular. This means that Philip saw himself as an advocate of God and was able to do what he wanted with the country.

For example, Philip tended to ignore the grandees, which is the opposite of what his father used to do, causing discontent amongst the highest nobles. Also, Philip ignored the Netherlands after his last visit and didn’t visit it again without placing his half-sister as regent, which made his authority less dominant over the Dutch people, who grew weary of Philip’s demands. This means that Philip’s lack of physical presence and his alienation of the Dutch people was a major reason for the general unrest happening.
On the other hand, religion played a significant role in causing the unrest compared to Philip's. This is because it was the basis of the majority of Dutch people's lives and when compared with cause an uproar. An example is the divide between Protestantism and Catholicism growing due to the Spanish Inquisition, which handed the Dutch Protestants into oppression which caused unrest. Furthermore, the Lord's acusation jury of 1566 was also a major cause of unrest as it put the Catholic Spanish loyalties against the Dutch criminals who mocked Catholic churches. This conveys how religion forced the hands of many of the Dutchers as it was a clear gap between the people and the Spanish monarch. Philip's actions were as significant when faced with this factor.

Also, another factor that made Philip's actions was as a significant cause was the role of the Grandees and William of Orange. They were the foundation of the unrest as they were the most powerful noble nobles and were beginning to dissent against Spanish rule. For example, the leading Grandees supported the 900 lesser nobles that signed the compromise made that safeguarded the release of the lower nobles into ensuring the compromise and applying pressure to Margaret of Parma. Also, William and the rest of the grandees secretly opposed Alva's arrival in 1567—bringing with him 70,000 men—and eventually left the states generally openly withdrawing their support of the Crown. This is a more significant factor than Philipp's actions as his examples of the Dutch nobility speaking out against Spain bolstering the unrest since higher levels.

Finally, one more factor outside of Philipp's actions is Margaret of Parma, who was made regent of the Netherlands and ordered to act when necessary necessary to curb the unrest.
For example, she made the unrest worse in 1566 when she branded the country as heretics to her half-brother, causing more trouble in the long-term. The Butcher's of Parma also caused in the needed nobles demands in the 1560s compromise, giving the unrest more fuel to burn on and granting it more reason to carry on. Compared to Philipp's actions, Margaret's ineffectiveness was a major factor when considering unrest between these years.
In conclusion, to some extent, Philip II's actions were a main factor for the unrest, however, it is a slight cause in relation to more important factors such as religion and the grandees.
Question 7

This attracted only a small number of responses and most were poor. Rather than consider the significance of Parma in the recovery of Spain’s position between 1577 and 1584, most described, in general terms, the course of the Dutch revolt in this period.

Though this answer appears to have an analytical focus, is clearly organised and attempts to reach a judgement, it badly lacks relevant knowledge and relies instead on vague assertion. It was given a L1 mark.

Plan:
- Very experienced with large military forces
- Could be threatening toward Dutch Protestants (food shortages, killings, etc)
- People began to fear him ☑️
- Catholic
- Mother was half-Sister to the King (Phillip), meaning he was related to royalty. ☑️

The duke of parma had a fairly significant role in the restoration of the Spanish rule as a result of many factors. These factors ranging from simple things such as his Catholic beliefs all the way up to much more complicated factors such as his royal relation.

A large reason for his significant role in the restoration of the Spanish rule was simply fear. The Dutch Protestants largely feared the Duke of Parma for a number of reasons, one of the main being his relation to Phillip, the Spanish and Dutch King. This relation would have scared the people to have any confrontational behaviour toward Parma for one of two reasons. One, the could not confront Royalty or two, anything said would very easily get back to the King himself. This small more complicated factor would have made Parma's authority increase, therefore, resulting in a much smaller chance of anyone confronting him or his authority, consequently meaning the restoration of the Spanish could begin.

The more complicated factors such as Parma's military experience as well as his way of ruling in Phillip's absence was also very closely working factors. Parma's great military experience and understanding could have possibly intimidated the Dutch people, therefore suggesting that he would not have been approached by anyone, again, most likely out of fear. They may have began to fear their lives if something they had actually said had offended the Duke in any way. As a result of this it could be suggested that Parma was a good ruler and this would have meant he had, had a very significant part in the restoration of Spanish control.

The other factor that could have linked to the Spanish gaining back their ever so lost control could have been... the lack of strong leaders of the revolt. With William of Orange's absence over the past few months and Egmont and Hoorn's assassinations, the Netherlands had no leg to stand on and began to fear death if they had spoken up, much like Egmont and Hoorn.

The disappearance of Orange and assassination of Egmont and Hoorn could well have been another factor linking to the restoration of the Spanish control due to the lack of leadership to keep the revolt going strong and successfully. It would have left a gap and that the Spanish could have quickly filled.

As well as this gap being filled by the Spanish, on Orange's return they would have already had the best control and Orange's lack of military experience would have shown. Therefore, putting Parma in his element. Parma would have out-fought him, and due to an array of much better tactics.

In conclusion, the Duke of Parma have the largest influence and significance on the restoration of Spanish control. His talents, relations and fear factor our did any of factors lack.
leadership, confidence and experience of the Dutch people.
There were many good answers to this question which focused very well on Spain’s increasing difficulties and how these impacted directly on its ability to deal with the Dutch revolt. Such responses included detailed examples from across the time frame of the question, for example how the unsustainable ambitions and financial problems of the Spanish monarchy required the diversion of Parma’s forces during the campaign against England in the 1580s and caused the successive mutinies of Spanish troops in the early seventeenth century. They then went on to consider a range of alternative factors, the impact of Maurice of Nassau particularly or the growing economic strength of the United Provinces, before coming to a judgement. Weaker candidates tended to have little detailed knowledge of Spain’s position during this period and were far more comfortable discussing other factors in the success of the Dutch revolt. While still relevant, they did not, as a result, meet fully the conceptual focus of the question.

This answer satisfies all the criteria for a L4 mark. It sustains an analysis of the issues raised in the question, is impressively detailed throughout with a range of specific examples to illustrate the points made and establishes valid criteria in coming to a judgement. As a result, it was given full marks.
The Treaty of Antwerp, signed in 1609 between Spain and the United Provinces signified the de facto independence of the United Provinces from Spain, the Dutch revolt's ultimate success. However, I believe that the success of the revolt was due to foreign intervention by countries like England or France, not the apparent declining power of Spain.

Spain's economic frailty between 1585-1609 can be seen as the main reason for the revolt's success, as Spain's inability to consistently pay its troops was the cause of many military setbacks. The Spanish Armada cost 2/3 of the Habsburg Empire's annual income to build and its destruction at the hands of the English in 1588 can be seen as a huge waste of money. Also, Spain's inability to pay its own troops due to multiple bankruptcies cost Spain many military victories. For example, the Spanish's failed capture of the Island of Formosa in 1599 caused the Spanish due to Spain being unable to pay its troops, the capture of the Island of Bommel failed, as the Spanish troops mutinied and sold the towns they had captured back to the Dutch. Also, Philip III was a spendthrift, who spent 4 times as much on court life (2 million florins) than his father.

These misuses of money led to Spain being unable to pay their troops, which in turn, meant that they wouldn't fight for them, costing Spain to lose their advantage over the Dutch, granting them success after success.

Spain's military blunders must also be considered as a major factor because these mistakes allowed the Dutch time that they desperately needed to regroup and reorganise in order to defeat the Spanish. Philip III's decision to send Parma and his 60,000 men to meet up with the Armada, in order to lead an invasion of England, which failed with the defeat of the Armada in 1588, caused the campaign against the Dutch to stall, which allowed them to regroup and reform their military and tactics, which proved far more effective against the Spanish troops, at the Battle of Bergen-op-Zoom in 1588, which was the first serious defeat the Spanish suffered.

The same happened again in April 1592, where Parma improved his military and tactics, which proved far more effective against the Spanish.
was sent with 20,000 men to capture Paris to prevent the French Protestant, Henry of Navarre, from becoming King of France. This again gave the Dutch time to act, causing Alva’s last gains in the Netherlands, Zutphen and Haarlem, to be lost to the Dutch. These mistakes allowed the revolt time to organise effective military resistance against the Spanish forces, handing the advantage back to the Dutch after Farm’s successful campaign earlier on.

However, Maurice of Nassau, William of Orange’s second son, played a vital role in the revolt’s success, as his re-organisation of the military allowed the revolt to continue to defeat the military might of Spain. Maurice reformed the Dutch army, standardising equipment for their regular paid forces and his new battalion size of 550 men created a sense of camaraderie in his new standing army. Which, along with his new pike & shot tactics, proved very effective against the Spanish. For example, Maurice’s new army defeated the Spanish at the Battle of the Nieuwpoort in 1569, killing 2,500 Spanish troops. His expertise of siege warfare meant that he could counter-attack the Spanish and capture their towns instead, reversing the

In May 1591, Maurice captured Tulliphen after only 6 days of siege and then Denteren in June 1591 after only 10 days of siege! Maurice's military prowess denied the Spanish victory time and time again against the Dutch, eventually leading to peace in 1609.

Foreign intervention's role is prominent in the rebell's success, because it diverted the attention from the Netherlands to other areas, causing them to divert vital men and resources.
The Treaty of Monsuch, signed in 1585 between England and the United Provinces was basically England's declaration of war against Spain by supporting the revolt. England provided 6,000 men, under the command of the Earl of Leicester and then Sir Francis Drake, along with 600,000 florins a year to the Dutch to support them. Spain.
England was also able to distract Spain's forces from the Dutch in 1588, with the Spanish Armada threatening an invasion of England, which was also successfully defeated in the same year by Sir Francis Drake, which caused Parma's direction to give the Dutch time to reorganize.
The invasion of France in 1592 also distracted
The Dutch campaign led by Pama again. That invasion was also a waste of resources as Henry of Navarre converted to Catholicism, uniting France against Spain, all of which allowed the United Provinces time to grow and increase their level of resistance, preventing Spain from achieving victory over the revolt.

In conclusion, I believe that the success of the Dutch revolt in the years 1585-1609 was in fact largely due to foreign intervention, not Spain's declining power. This is because intervention in England and France caused Spain to have to divert men and resources from the Netherlands, which, along with the multitude of defeats these new fronts caused Spain, allowed Maurice to increase the effectiveness of Dutch resistance to Spain's might, ultimately leading to their formal independence in 1609.
