Extract from ‘Collision Course: The Olympic Tragedy of Mary Decker and Zola Budd’ by Jason Henderson (2016).

This edited extract, written by British sports writer Jason Henderson, describes two runners crashing into each other at the 1984 Olympic Games in Los Angeles, United States of America. Mary Decker was the world champion running for the USA. Zola Budd was a teenage athlete, who ran barefoot, representing Great Britain.

Turn over

Struggling to keep her balance, Zola's pencil-thin left leg flicked out sideways, tangling with Mary's right leg and the American stumbled as if she had caught her feet on a trip wire, plunging forward violently with a thud onto the grass on the inside of the track. Around the arena, spectators gasped in horror. In the press seats, hundreds of journalists yelled in unison "she's down!" in a dozen different languages. 5 10

"Mary didn't respond immediately to my change of pace and when I saw she wasn't coming with me as I picked up the pace I cut inside," recalled Zola. 15

"There was still a bit of bumping - but I didn't see Mary's fall and my conscience is clear." When the tumble took place, Mary was in Zola's blind spot. Straight after the collision, though, Zola glanced sharply to her left to see what had happened, slowing down in the process as Puică* and Sly stormed past her to take the lead. 20

Immediately, Mary was surrounded by 25 medics who began examining the injured left hip. Not that this mattered now.
 Mary's pain was probably more mental than physical as it dawned on her that her chance to win gold had disappeared 30 in a flash. Back in the race, Zola quickly regained the lead ahead of Sly and Puică, as the three had broken clear from the rest of the field in the melee.

Now running with a gash on her left leg 35
 – a bloody reminder of the incident – and tears in her eyes, Zola intuitively realised someone had fallen but claimed she was not completely certain who until she completed a further lap and approached 40 the point where Mary was lying, at this stage on her back, in floods of tears and surrounded by medics and cameramen.

“As Zola came past the scene of the accident, she glanced down at her 45 crumpled idol,” wrote the Daily Mail.
 “She seemed mesmerised by it, as we are mesmerised by the mangled wreckage on a motorway hard shoulder.
 She looked as stunned as someone who 50
 had slashed the Mona Lisa in a moment of madness.”

Amid the chaos, Sly and Puică kept their cool. The crowd’s boos were breaking Zola’s spirit, but her British team-mate 55 and the Romanian were focused on winning medals. “I told myself not to be disturbed by the commotion,” said Sly, “and to think only of winning the gold medal. After the Decker incident I 60 realised a big gap had opened up and this was the chance.”

With a lap-and-a-half to go, Sly again challenged for the lead, in a similar fashion to the way she did before Mary's fall. Only this time she was more decisive and coming into the home straight with just over a lap to go, she surged past Zola into the lead with Puică following. "Out in the lead I felt inspired," said Sly. "I was prepared to die for victory."

Zola instantly began to drop back and within a few seconds was 20m behind. Now there were only two athletes capable of winning – Sly and Puică – a scenario no one had predicted.

Sensing victory, Puică ran her final lap to win as Sly took a hard-fought silver medal. Still in third with 200m to go, a disconsolate Zola tailed off to finish a weary seventh after virtually jogging her final 400m. It was almost as if she was postponing the moment when a fresh nightmare of accusation and counter-accusation would begin.

Extract from ‘The First Four Minutes’ by Roger Bannister (1955).

This edited extract is taken from Sir Roger Bannister’s autobiographical account of how he became the first man to run a mile in under four minutes. In this extract he describes his experience in the Olympic Games in 1952 in Helsinki, Finland. He went on to become one of the most famous sportsmen in history and was knighted in 1975.

I felt great admiration for the winner as he climbed the Olympic podium. He was a worthy victor, tougher as well as faster than the rest of us. I knew his happiness must be without limit. He was strong and courageous, and fortune had smiled on him. No one could begrudge* him his success. 5

Many things could have gone wrong before we even reached the final. The ordeal was now over, and in the great joy of that single moment the agony of the previous week was quite forgotten. I had found new meaning in the Olympic words that the important thing was not the winning but the taking part – not the conquering but the fighting well. All week I had seen the interplay of success and failure, and felt no bitterness at the outcome of my own race. My only chance to win an Olympic title was over. I had seen some who had been beaten when with a luckier position they might have won. Others had won and I had been happy for them. 10 15 20 25

There was some criticism in the British press over my failure. Britain had not won a gold medal on the track, and I was the last chance. Some writers were more considerate, and asked how coming fourth in a race of this kind, and breaking the Olympic record, could possibly be called failure. One writer ended his criticism with, 'I feel like suing British athletes for breach of promise.'

35

To me it was failure – when the immediate joy of relief had faded. But what use was there in revealing the speed of my last time trial before the games? If one fails in the Olympics there is no second chance – the years of waiting would seem an eternity of hopelessness. Any attempt to explain away a disappointment is taken as an admission of failure.

40

The games were a great success. No nation can wreck the Olympic movement, when to run costs an athlete no more than food and shelter, a pair of running shoes, and willingness to drive himself to the furthest limit of exhaustion. 50

After the games there was a post-mortem on the corpse of British sport. Cure-alls are as common in sport as they are in matters of health. Could we convince ourselves that we had not failed, that it was merely the astonishing ability of the others to beat us? If we keep our own attitude other countries will respect us more and we shall still enjoy our sport. 55 60

The Helsinki Olympic Games were a turning point in my life, in more ways than one. Until then I had on the whole been successful in all the races that mattered to me. I do not find it easy 65 to be overconfident, but an Olympic victory might easily have made me so.
 My opponents were stronger, physically and psychologically. I was not able to bear the responsibility thrust on my 70 shoulders, the terrible burden of having to win. I had tried to bear it alone by developing an attitude of isolation without any buffers between myself and success or failure. 75

begrudge* – resent, be jealous of buffers – barriers, shields
