John Lewis seeks out the super-rich with plans for Dubai outlet as its international expansion increases

Upmarket UK retailer John Lewis is planning to open an outlet in Dubai in 2017, as it seeks to move in to the prosperous Middle East retail market. At 15,000 square feet this will be John Lewis’ biggest international shop-in-shop (an outlet within an existing store) and will open within the Robinsons department store in Dubai’s Festival City Mall.

This John Lewis outlet will sell quality bedroom, bathroom and living room items, as well as own brand furniture, cookware, textiles, glassware and nursery products.

The Dubai store marks the latest step in John Lewis’ bid to increase its international portfolio. It has announced plans to open another seven outlets in Holland, adding to the three shops already open.

With outlets in the ASEAN (Association of Southeast Asian Nations) trade bloc in Malaysia, Singapore and the Philippines, John Lewis currently has 14 international ‘shop-in-shops.’ It has ruled out expanding by takeover or merger.

John Lewis expands its international strategy

John Lewis is taking steps to expand further its international coverage, after a year in which online international sales have increased by 50%. At the same time, international visits to its website have increased by 15%.

John Lewis has extended from 33 to 40 the number of countries that it delivers to through its website, johnlewis.com. Now customers can order for delivery to countries including Hong Kong, the Philippines and Malaysia. As well as this, customers can now choose a wide range of currencies when making payments.

The move comes as John Lewis has said it will have a physical presence in Australia for the first time, when it opens six shop-in-shops in branches of Australian department store, Myer.

Post-Brexit sterling plunge ‘will be a big issue’ for John Lewis next year

Andy Street, the boss of John Lewis, has warned that the fall in the value of the pound as a result of the UK vote to leave the European Union could become a major issue for them. John Lewis imports about two-thirds of the goods it sells and one third of that is purchased in dollars.

However, Mr Street did say that his major concern was the potential reduction in the growth of consumer spending as the economy looks set to move into recession.

John Lewis is not the only business to have warned of the problems posed by a falling pound. Sports Direct said that it will be ‘impacted significantly’ by the fall in sterling. EasyJet and British Airways have both issued profit warnings following the vote.

Pinewood predicts weaker pound will bring Hollywood ending

Pinewood Studios, the north London film studio (where the James Bond films are made), said the fall in the pound after the EU referendum vote will be good for business. Sterling has lost more than 10% of its value against the dollar in the month following the vote. Pinewood has mostly US customers who will now find its studios considerably cheaper to book. “The decline in the sterling exchange rate is undoubtedly positive for our international customers,” said chief executive Ivan Dunleavy. Last year’s profit for the year of £7.8m is expected to increase because of changes in the value of the pound.

Shanghai Disneyland Opens, With Details Tailored to Chinese Consumers

Disney's $5.5bn Shanghai theme park, its first in mainland China, opened in June 2016. The resort which took 17 years to build is the largest foreign investment ever made by Disney.

It is not merely a case of copying the 'Americanized' style of theme park. Efforts are being made to incorporate Chinese stories, history, symbolism and local customs into the resort.

From the peony flower design on the turret of the park's centerpiece castle, to a Beijing opera interlude in the Mandarin version of the Lion King musical, Disney has taken care to incorporate Chinese elements into the resort.

"We didn't build Disneyland in China, we built China's Disneyland," said Disney Chief Executive Officer Robert Iger.

Leia Mi, the concept designer for the Shanghai theme park's castle, said that Disney conducted thorough market research into Chinese preferences. For example, while other Disneylands have a castle that guests walk through, the Shanghai theme park castle was designed with eating and retail space inside to meet Chinese expectations.

UK cosmetics firm Lush says mission for slavery-clean supply chain never ending

As British retailer Lush expands globally, the head of ethical buying at the handmade cosmetics company says he is facing an almost impossible challenge - ensuring all products are free of slave labour and other human rights abuses.

Simon Constantine, the son of two of Lush’s founders, said sales increased 100% and profit increased by almost 50% to £31m ($40m) since 2013. This created the potential for wider social impact by sourcing from more local communities. But he said this growth had also opened a set of new problems for Lush - which prides itself on its products being ethically sourced, environmentally friendly and not tested on animals - particularly as it expands in Asia.

Founded on an ethos to do good while doing business and campaigning on social issues, Lush vowed in 2014 to stop using mica from India in cosmetics as child labour was found to be common in the mica industry. The company also refuses to use sandalwood from India for similar worker concerns, instead sourcing from Australia. It has drastically reduced its use of palm oil, concerned about deforestation, human rights abuses and slavery in that industry.
