Extracts for use with Section A.

Extract 1: From A Forrest, Napoleon, published in 2011.

In December 1812, Napoleon himself left his troops in Russia and hastily returned to Paris. But there was no way he could disguise the scale of the catastrophe. In the course of the Moscow Campaign, he had lost the largest army of the entire war. The losses were astounding. Napoleon's prestige as a military strategist and battlefield tactician was now seriously damaged. 5

The Moscow Campaign demonstrated that the remarkable military abilities he had shown as a younger man were fading. He was less supple, fatter, and more fatigued by long days in the saddle. His health, too, was beginning to desert him. He could no longer maintain his demanding work ethic and increasingly depended on his marshals to make key military decisions. These marshals did not always display the same qualities as those of early years. Napoleon never learned to delegate, and had tended to promote those most loyal to him. His failure to develop the talents of his officers or to reshape the higher command system of the army was a source of weakness that would be increasingly evident in his final campaigns. 10 15

Russia had serious international consequences too. The scale of Napoleon's defeat put his earlier conquests at risk when the other European powers realised the full extent of French military weakness. In Spain, the withdrawal of French troops to serve in the east provided the British with an opportunity to mount a major offensive that left southern Spain in Allied hands. 20

Extract 2: From R Harvey, The War of Wars: The Epic Struggle Between Britain and France 1789–1815, published in 2007.

Most historians of the Napoleonic War have traced the downfall of Napoleon from the Russian disaster. But this is mistaken on two counts. First, the Peninsular War, extending over several years, had been possibly an even greater defeat for the French. Second, the man more than forty years old had apparently gone into decline, become plump and slow to react, preferring to surround himself with only those who agreed with him. However, after the Russian campaign had ended, he seemed to rejuvenate himself. 25

In adversity, Napoleon was suddenly to recover himself. The impossible legend of infallibility had been destroyed forever and now he had to show that he could recover and that he was still a commander of energy and skill. Fight back he did, displaying a ferocity none expected and in a manner that could have protected his throne and extended his domination of Europe for years to come. Russia had dealt him a huge blow, but not a mortal one. The sheer speed of his recovery was to take all his enemies by surprise. 30

The fight back had begun with his decision to abandon the tattered remains of the Grande Armée and travel to Paris at the fastest possible speed. 35
