Pearson – International GCSE Art and Design Taxonomy

How to use the Taxonomy in conjunction with the Assessment Grid

Both components in this qualification are 100% externally assessed, however centres will find it helpful to use the taxonomy and assessment grid to provide feedback on student's progress.

- When assessing work for each component, examiners will make a holistic judgement using the descriptors in the taxonomy, to establish which performance band matches most closely the candidate's work.
- Candidate's work that falls between two performance bands must achieve all the keyword descriptors in the lower band and some in the band above. Where this happens, examiners will use their professional judgement to decide which performance band is most appropriate using a 'best-fit' approach.
- After a performance band has been established, the next stage is to use the assessment grid to decide a mark within the performance band. Read through 'Applying the Assessment Grid' on page 41 of the specification prior to establishing a mark for each assessment objective and total mark.

To respond to the thematic brief of Collections, I selected for my primary study, a collection of chillies using colour pencil. I brought a few chillies into school and arranged them. Using the pencils, which I felt had a slightly limited colour range compared to oil paint, I concentrated on layering the colours to get the minute differences in the hues right. Through this study, I was able to gain more knowledge in using shadows and highlights to portray the curvy, 3 dimensional shape. For my second study, I chose a collection of ice cubes. As they melt so quickly, I had to take my own photographs and use one. As there were little variation in color, I chose to draw these with pencils, concentrating on the shadows. I used sharpened 6B pencil for the darkest shadows, 4B for the general shadow, and HB for lightest shadows. To make the shadows with large area smooth, I used a blunt HB pencil, and smudged it using a flat brush. For my third study I thought about hands. They not only have collections of fingers but within there are multiple collections, for example the small wrinkles, veins and nails. I completed this study using oil paint so that I could achieve the small tonal variances. This study took a considerable time as I wanted to capture the detail. Although difficult and timely, I want to develop the concept of hands and started to research some of the many hand painters that there are,

To develop my idea I looked at He Lihuai, a Chinese contemporary artist born in 1961. He is figurative painter and much of his work concerns woman.

Why I chose this artist :

I found the way the hands were painted in classical paintings beautiful, how they were idealistic hands with natural elegance and delicacy. They were arranged so they were bent and intertwined in a way that accentuated the natural curves and angles, yet not contorted to the extremity so they maintained the elegant look, and had slightly exaggerated colouring, the blush in the fingertips more prominent to give them the image of healthy youth. However, as I begin my research, I found that many images of hands in classical paintings were too low in quality to make a study of, as they were only a small parts in a large painting. Upon further research, I found this painting, Hands, painted by He Lihuai. Despite being a contemporary artist, his art referenced the style and atmosphere of classical paintings, and with better attention to detail as this was a study focusing solely on hands. I decided that this piece was the most suitable for my study.

Coursework Prep 2 - MY RESPONSE TO ARTIST

Oil paint on watercolour paper, A3

Referencing He Lihuai style, I took a photo of my hands, with my friend's help. I arranged my hands so they would interact with each other, fingers bending in a way that accentuates them. I used photoshop to bring out the colours. For the background, I used a bundle of cloth, my cardigan, so the folds of the fabric will follow the flow of curves made by my hands, highlighting them. I chose blue fabric, as the artist did, to make it contrast with the red blush of the hands. I used photoshop to mute the colour from a vibrant blue to a more greyish blue, so the focus of the painting could be the hands, not the fabric. I painted my study using oil paint and carefully applied subtle layers.

I wanted to develop my work further and really stretch and challenge my style of working. I had some understanding of Art Nouveau. Art nouveau was an art movement that flourished between 1890 and 1910, a reaction against the academic art and historicism of 19th century. The movement sought to dismantle the distinction between fine arts and academic arts, gaining popularity in interior design, jewelry design and more. Through this style I want to make the shape of the hands the main focus so in choosing Art nouveau, its defining characteristic being the use of curves, which suited the softness of the hands I was trying to convey, I felt confident. I chose the artist William H. Bradley, an American Art Nouveau illustrator. I simplified the hands into shapes and curves, filled it out with flat colours, and added a plant motif decorative patterns to the background in keeping with the style. For the pattern, I used pepper plants as the motif, as I had done a primary source study of chilli peppers on prep.1 and thought it would bring coherence to incorporate this.

ARTIST INVESTIGATION, PLANNING MY FINAL OUTCOME AND SECTION STUDY

Denis Sarazhin, Samdi, le tableau de Samdi, 1982

My development and response to Denis Sarazhin

My plan for my Final Outcome

For my next development, I combined the two art styles, and planned to paint a collection of hands, the style starting out as the classical oil painting style and gradually becoming Art Nouveau. The composition of the hands and the dark background to contrast with brightly coloured hands was inspired by a third artist, Denis Sarazhin, a contemporary artist from the Ukraine. I experimented with his style through taking a series of photos of my hands in various overlapping positions, and used photoshop to gradually airbrush more of the details away, until it became a completely flat colour. The other hands I left in a realistic fashion. I then painted a section of the hands, the most difficult to allow me to understand any nuances of the painting process which needed to be addressed before.

After completing the section, I started to plan for my final outcome. I wanted the hands to look more connected, so I made a new photoshop with hands interacting with each other. I feel my artists have informed the planning of my final outcome to this point and helped me combine a collection of hands which reference both traditional and contemporary genres of art.
