This form should be used to record the process of your project and be submitted as evidence with the final piece of work.

You may want to discuss:

- what you have done (eg, from one week to the next)
- if you are working in a group, what discussions you have had

05/01/2010 - 19/01/2010	During this period, I decided on the title of my project and what I aimed to gain by doing it. I created a plan of action describing different areas of computer science that I wanted to investigate. This plan would also help me to think ahead and plan how I would structure my project into different questions. It would also aid me in my research as I would already know what to look into so that I could specifically search for the information that would be useful in answering my project question.
19/01/2010	I filled in the project proposal form to identify precisely why I had chosen the project title and what skills and information I hoped to gain from the project.
20/01/2010 - 09/02/2010	At this time, I carried out research into computer science and I collected data and information that would help me to answer the original question. I learnt more about what computer science is and how I can enter a career in this area.
16/02/2010	I carried out a survey into personal computer usage by asking people in my class to complete a survey. This would tell me about the influence of computer science in the real world. After collecting my results, I analysed the results by finding statistical information such as averages.
17/02/2010 - 30/03/2010	In this period, I wrote up my project, looking at all of the research that I had done, analysing it and using it to answer my initial question. I kept to the timescale and had finished all of the main discussion stage of the project by the target date.
31/03/2010	On this day, I summarised what I had previously written into a short conclusion, explaining what I had learnt and how it had affected me personally.
